

Flamingo Rise

REAL TOOLS. BRIGHTER TOMORROWS.

CONFIDENCE
ISN'T ABOUT BEING PERFECT.
IT'S ABOUT
BACKING YOURSELF
ANYWAY.

Confidence Building WORKBOOK

A practical toolkit to help you challenge self-doubt, recognise your strengths and take intentional action to build unshakeable confidence.

CHALLENGE

BELIEVE

TAKE ACTION

BECAUSE A MORE CONFIDENT YOU
CREATES A BRIGHTER TOMORROW.

Braver
Bolder
You

CONFIDENCE BUILDING WORKBOOK

Welcome — Confidence Isn't What You Think

Let's kill one myth immediately.

Confident people aren't confident all the fucking time.

They doubt themselves.

They get nervous.

They walk into rooms wondering whether everybody else knows something they don't.

They make mistakes.

They embarrass themselves.

Sometimes they completely fuck things up.

The difference?

They don't always interpret discomfort as evidence that they shouldn't do something.

Confidence isn't:

"I know this will go perfectly."

It's closer to:

"I don't know how this is going to go, but I trust myself enough to find out."

And here's the slightly annoying bit.

If you're waiting until you feel confident before doing the thing that scares you...

You might be waiting a bloody long time.

Confidence usually isn't the starting point.

It's the evidence you collect afterwards.

So this workbook isn't going to teach you to feel amazing about yourself.

We're going to build evidence that you can back yourself even when you're not completely sure.

1. What Are You Already Good At?

The original worksheet starts by asking you to list five strengths.

We're keeping that.

But we're not accepting:

"I don't really have any."

Bollocks.

You might struggle to recognise them.

That's different.

Think beyond obvious skills.

Maybe you're:

Reliable.

Funny.

Resourceful.

Patient.

Creative.

Organised.

Good in a crisis.

Independent.

Compassionate.

Persistent.

Good with people.

Good at solving problems.

Quick to learn.

Brave when it actually matters.

Write five strengths:

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____

Now comes the important bit.

Where's your evidence?

For every strength, write one real example that proves it.

Not:

"I think I'm quite resilient."

Give me the receipt.

What happened? What did you do?

Confidence gets stronger when your brain has evidence, not adjectives.

2. Stop Moving the Goalposts

Ever achieved something and immediately decided it doesn't really count?

You got the job.

"They must have been desperate."

Somebody compliments you.

"They're just being nice."

You handle something difficult.

"Anyone would have done it."

You achieve something you'd been terrified of.

Five minutes later:

"Well, it wasn't actually that hard."

Congratulations.

You've just moved the fucking goalposts. 😏

Think about three things you've done that you routinely minimise.

For each:

What did I actually achieve?

What did it require from me?

Why do I dismiss it?

Would I dismiss somebody else's achievement the same way?

And:

What happens if I just allow it to count?

No qualifier.

No “but...”

You did it.

Put it in the evidence pile.

3. Confidence or Competence?

These are not the same thing.

You can be:

Good at something and terrified.

Or:

Extremely confident and completely fucking useless.

We've all met the second one. 😂

Sometimes what you call a confidence problem is actually:

"I haven't learned how to do this yet."

That's not a character flaw.

That's a skill gap.

Think about something you lack confidence in.

Ask:

Do I actually know how to do this?

Have I had enough practice?

What knowledge am I missing?

What could I learn?

Who could teach me?

What could I practise privately before doing it publicly?

If the problem is competence:

Build competence.

Don't sit around trying to affirm yourself into knowing how to do something you've never learned.

4. What Are You Actually Afraid Of?

Pick something you'd like to do but keep avoiding.

The thing:

Now finish:

If I do this, I'm worried that...

Keep going.

And if THAT happened, it would mean...

Again.

And if THAT were true, then...

Eventually you'll usually find the actual fear.

Maybe it's:

Rejection.

Embarrassment.

Failure.

Judgement.

Looking stupid.

Disappointing somebody.

Discovering you're not as good as you hoped.

Or even:

Succeeding and then having to live up to it.

Now ask:

How likely is the thing I'm afraid of?

If it happened, what would I actually do?

Have I survived something similar before?

Would it be uncomfortable — or genuinely catastrophic?

There's a difference.

5. Your Confidence Avoidance Loop

Here's where confidence problems become self-perpetuating.

Something scares you.

You avoid it.

Immediate relief.

Your brain learns:

“Excellent. Avoidance kept us safe.”

Next time it feels even scarier.

And around we fucking go.

Think about something you're avoiding because you don't feel confident enough.

What am I avoiding?

What short-term relief does avoiding it give me?

What does avoidance cost me long-term?

What evidence am I accidentally giving my brain?

Now:

What's the smallest version of this thing I could actually do?

Not the heroic version.

The slightly uncomfortable but manageable version.

That's where we start.

6. Borrowed Confidence

Sometimes you're not lacking confidence.

You're giving somebody else far too much authority over it.

Think about whose opinion affects how you feel about yourself.

A partner?

Parent?

Boss?

Friend?

Strangers online?

Someone who rejected you fifteen fucking years ago?

Whose approval am I chasing?

Why does their opinion carry so much weight?

Are they actually qualified to judge this?

Would I ask this person for advice?

And here's my favourite:

If I wouldn't ask for their advice, why the fuck am I accepting their criticism as gospel?

Not everybody gets a vote.

7. Reframing Without Bullshitting Yourself

The original worksheet asks you to turn negative thoughts into empowering statements.

We're keeping the principle.

We're changing the method.

Because:

"I'm going to completely embarrass myself."

doesn't need to become:

"I AM POWERFUL AND EVERYBODY WILL LOVE ME."

Your brain isn't stupid. 😂

Instead:

Negative thought

"I'm going to embarrass myself."

Evidence

What makes me think that?

Reality check

Can I actually know what's going to happen?

Accurate reframe

"I might feel awkward. That's not the same as disaster."

Now do three of your own.

Thought → Evidence → Reality Check → Accurate Reframe.

We're not aiming for positive.

We're aiming for credible.

8. The 7-Day Confidence Evidence Log

The original seven-day log is worth keeping.

But instead of simply recording something you did well, each day record:

What did I do?

What made it difficult?

What did I do despite that?

What does this prove about me?

Your examples don't need to be spectacular.

Maybe you:

Spoke up.

Made a phone call.

Tried something new.

Asked a question.

Went somewhere alone.

Set a boundary.

Admitted you didn't know something.

Accepted a compliment without arguing with it. 😊

Collect receipts.

Seven days.

Seven pieces of evidence.

9. Things I Can Actually Believe

We're replacing the old Positive Affirmations section.

Try these instead:

I don't need to know exactly what I'm doing before I begin.

Feeling nervous doesn't mean I'm incapable.

I can learn things I'm currently shit at.

Other people's confidence doesn't reduce my ability.

I don't need everybody to approve of me.

I can survive embarrassment. I've done it before.

I am allowed to take up space while I'm still learning.

Making a mistake doesn't erase everything I do well.

I can be scared and still do the thing.

I have evidence that I can handle difficult situations.

Now write three statements about yourself that you actually believe.

Not aspirational wallpaper.

Something true.

10. Do the Bloody Thing

Time to choose something.

Not your biggest fear.

We're building confidence, not auditioning for I'm a Celebrity. 😂

Something I've been putting off:

What I'm afraid might happen:

What's realistically likely to happen:

The smallest first step:

When I'm going to do it:

What I'll do if it doesn't go perfectly:

And then:

DO IT.

Come back afterwards.

What actually happened?

What did I handle better than expected?

What did I learn?

What will I do next?

That's confidence building.

Not thinking.

Doing.

Final Reflection

Before you finish:

What have I realised about my confidence?

Where have I underestimated myself?

What achievements have I been dismissing?

Where am I confusing lack of confidence with lack of experience?

Whose opinion am I giving too much power?

What am I avoiding?

What's one thing I'm going to do anyway?

A Final FlamingoRise Note

You don't need to become the loudest person in the room.

You don't need to walk around believing you're fucking incredible at everything.

And you certainly don't need to eliminate self-doubt.

Confidence is much simpler than that.

It's learning:

I might not know exactly what I'm doing — but I trust myself enough to have a go.

Sometimes you'll smash it.

Sometimes you'll learn something.

Sometimes you'll make an absolute tit of yourself.

Welcome to being human. 😂

The important thing is that you stop letting the possibility of discomfort make all your decisions for you.

Challenge the doubt.

Collect the evidence.

Take the action.

And eventually your brain starts getting the message:

Maybe I can fucking do this.

Rise. Heal. Soar. 🦩