DAILY GRATITUDE PRACTICE

Notice what's good without pretending the shit bits aren't there.

The original was beautifully simple: for seven days, write what you're grateful for, something that made you smile and a positive memory you recalled.

We're keeping that heart. But gratitude works much better when it isn't used as compulsory positivity. You can appreciate your coffee and still be furious about your morning. You can love somebody and be disappointed in them. You can be grateful for what you have and still want your circumstances to change.

This workbook is about widening the picture - not painting over the difficult bits in pink.

Wellbeing note: Gratitude is a reflection practice, not treatment and not a requirement to feel positive. If a prompt feels wrong for where you are today, skip it.

1. GRATITUDE WITHOUT THE TOXIC POSITIVITY

What does gratitude mean to me?

Have I ever felt pressured to 'look on the bright side' when something genuinely hurt?

What is the difference between appreciating something and pretending everything is okay?

What am I allowed to be unhappy about even while other things are good?

What kind of gratitude practice would feel honest rather than forced?

What ordinary things do I tend to overlook because they're always there?

REALITY CHECK

Gratitude is allowed to sit next to grief, anger, fear, frustration and ambition. Nobody has to leave the room.

2. YOUR GRATITUDE MENU

If 'name three things you're grateful for' makes your brain immediately go blank, use categories.

PEOPLE

- Someone who helped me
- Someone who made me laugh
- Someone I can be myself with

ORDINARY COMFORTS

- Food/drink
- Warmth
- Bed/sofa
- Music/TV/game/book
- A useful object

BODY & SENSES

- Something I could see
- Hear
- Taste
- Touch
- Smell
- Something my body enabled me to do

MOMENTS

- Something funny
- Something peaceful
- Something easier than expected
- A tiny win
- A pleasant surprise

MYSELF

- Something I handled
- A choice I made
- Something I learned

■ A quality I showed

■ A boundary/action I'm proud of

You do not need a sunrise over a mountain. 'The cat was ridiculous' absolutely counts.

DAY 1 - NOTICE THE OBVIOUS

Start with what's easy to see.

I am grateful for...

Something that made me smile today...

A positive or comforting memory I recalled...

One ordinary thing that made life easier...

Something I don't want to take for granted...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 2 - THE SMALL STUFF

Today we're looking for the tiny things that normally don't get a round of applause.

A tiny comfort I noticed...

Something that worked properly today...

A sound/smell/taste/sight I enjoyed...

Something mildly ridiculous that amused me...

One convenience I'm glad exists...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 3 - PEOPLE & CONNECTION

Notice connection without pretending every relationship is perfect.

Someone I appreciated today, and why...

A kind thing I received or witnessed...

A moment I felt connected...

Someone I miss or remember fondly...

One relationship truth I can appreciate without idealising it...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 4 - YOURSELF

Yes, you're allowed to put yourself on the gratitude list.

Something I handled today...

A quality I showed...

A decision I'm glad I made...

Something my body or mind helped me do...

One thing I can thank Past Me for...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 5 - WHAT GOT ME THROUGH

Gratitude can include the things that made a difficult day slightly more survivable.

Something that supported me...

A coping tool/comfort that helped...

A person, place or routine that made things easier...

One thing I managed despite the day being difficult...

Something I can appreciate WITHOUT saying the difficult thing 'happened for a reason'...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 6 - MEMORY & MEANING

Look backwards without demanding that every memory be positive.

A memory that makes me smile...

A person/place/time I'm glad I experienced...

Something from my past that still adds value now...

A lesson I can appreciate without being grateful for the pain that taught it...

Something I'd like to remember from this stage of my life...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

DAY 7 - THE FULL PICTURE

Good, difficult, funny, annoying, meaningful - let the whole week exist.

Three things I genuinely appreciated this week...

Something difficult I am NOT required to be grateful for...

Something surprising that was good...

Something I appreciate about myself...

What I want to notice more often next week...

TODAY'S TINY WIN

3. WHEN GRATITUDE FEELS IMPOSSIBLE

Some days, asking 'What are you grateful for?' is irritating at best and insulting at worst. So don't force it.

What feels hard today?

What do I need acknowledged before I go looking for positives?

What is neutral rather than good? ('I have a blanket.' 'The kettle works.' 'Today will end.')

What made things 1% less awful?

What support exists, even if I wish I didn't need it?

What can I appreciate WITHOUT being grateful for the situation itself?

You are allowed to use neutral noticing instead of gratitude. The Gratitude Police will not be attending.

4. GRATITUDE FOR YOURSELF

What have I done recently that made life easier for Future Me?

What boundary am I glad I set?

What have I kept going through?

What skill do I forget I have?

What quality in myself am I grateful for?

What mistake taught me something useful?

What part of myself deserves more acknowledgement?

You count as one of the people in your life worth appreciating. Wild concept, apparently.

5. GRATITUDE & WANTING MORE

What am I genuinely grateful for in my current life?

What do I still want to change?

Can both things be true without cancelling each other out?

What am I ready to build towards?

What would 'more' mean to me - more peace, money, fun, time, connection, freedom, creativity, stability?

What existing strength/resource can help me move towards it?

Gratitude is not a contract agreeing never to want anything different.

6. BUILD A PRACTICE YOU'LL ACTUALLY KEEP

Do I prefer morning, evening or random moments?

Writing, voice notes, photos or simply noticing?

Daily, weekly or whenever I remember?

Do I like three things, one detailed thing, or themed prompts?

What makes a gratitude practice start feeling like homework?

What is my minimum version on low-capacity days?

Where could I naturally attach this practice to something I already do?

MY MINIMUM GRATITUDE PRACTICE

Today I noticed: _____

It mattered because: _____

One thing. Two lines. Done. No gold star required.

7. 30 GRATITUDE PROMPTS FOR REAL LIFE

- Something that made today easier.
- A person who taught me something useful.
- A smell I love.
- A meal/snack/drink I enjoyed.
- A piece of technology I'm glad exists.
- Something beautiful I saw.
- A mistake that turned out okay.
- A place I feel comfortable.
- Something funny from this week.
- A song that always does something to me.
- Something I own and genuinely use.
- A tiny luxury.
- Something Past Me did for Current Me.
- Something Current Me can do for Future Me.
- A freedom I value.
- A choice I have.
- A pet/animal moment.
- Something about my home.
- A skill I have.
- A conversation I appreciated.
- Something I no longer have to deal with.
- A problem that got solved.
- A person who showed up.
- A moment of quiet.
- Something I learned.
- Something my body enabled today.
- A boundary I'm grateful I have.
- Something I can look forward to.
- Something ordinary I'd miss if it disappeared.

- Something about myself I appreciate today.

FINAL REFLECTION

What did I notice more often during this practice?

Which prompts felt easiest?

Which ones annoyed me?

Did gratitude change my attention without asking me to deny difficult things?

What ordinary things matter more than I realised?

What did I appreciate about myself?

What kind of practice do I want to keep?

What am I grateful for right now - if anything?

A FINAL FLAMINGORISE NOTE

Gratitude does not mean being thankful for every bloody thing that happens to you.

It means allowing the good to be visible too.

Some days that good will be enormous. Some days it'll be a person you love, a safe home, a breakthrough or a proper belly laugh. Other days it'll be hot tea, clean socks and the fact that nobody has required you to leave the sofa.

Notice what is genuinely worth noticing. Leave the forced positivity in the bin.

Same brilliant you. Just bolder.

Rise. Heal. Soar.
