VALUES EXPLORATION WORKBOOK

Welcome — What Actually Matters to You?

Here's a question that sounds ridiculously simple:

What actually matters to you?

Not what should matter.

Not what your parents taught you should matter.

Not what looks impressive on Instagram.

Not what your partner, friends, boss or random woman from school who you haven't spoken to since 2003 thinks should matter.

You.

Your values are the things that influence what feels right, what feels wrong, what you're willing to fight for and what makes a life actually feel like yours.

The problem?

A lot of us have never consciously chosen them.

We inherit beliefs, expectations and priorities and then spend years wondering why the life we've built doesn't quite fucking fit.

So we're going to work out what matters to you — and then comes the slightly less comfortable bit:

Are you actually living like it matters?

1. What Do You Value?

Don't overthink this bit.

Look at the words below and circle anything that immediately feels important to you.

Honesty · Family · Freedom · Security · Adventure · Kindness · Independence · Loyalty ·
Creativity · Stability · Growth · Success · Connection · Courage · Fairness · Health ·
Learning · Fun · Authenticity · Respect · Community · Peace · Achievement · Love ·
Curiosity · Responsibility · Compassion · Purpose · Trust · Balance

Something missing?

Add your own.

My values:

For now, choose as many as you like.

We'll murder the list in a minute. 😂

2. The Brutal Cut

Now choose your TEN most important values.

Done?

Good.

Now cut them to FIVE.

Yes, five.

And no, “but they're all important” isn't getting you out of it. 😊

The point isn't that everything else suddenly becomes meaningless.

We're trying to identify the values that sit underneath your biggest decisions.

My five:

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____
4. _____
5. _____

Now imagine you could only keep THREE.

Which survive?

Those three deserve some attention.

3. Are They Actually YOUR Values?

Here's where it gets interesting.

For each of your top values, ask:

Why does this matter to me?

Where did I learn that it matters?

Would I still choose it if nobody else knew?

Does this value make my life better — or does it just make me look like the person I think I'm supposed to be?

Because sometimes what we call a value is actually an expectation.

You might write success when what you really value is security.

You might write family because you've been taught family comes before everything — while repeatedly allowing family members to treat you like shit.

You might write kindness when what you're actually practising is people-pleasing.

We're not looking for the nicest list.

We're looking for the truest one.

4. Values Aren't Personality Traits

This distinction matters.

Having honesty as a value doesn't mean you've never lied.

Valuing health doesn't mean you live like a wellness influencer.

Valuing family doesn't mean you have a perfect relationship with yours.

Values aren't trophies you award yourself for being a good person.

They're directions.

And sometimes our behaviour goes completely the opposite bloody way.

That's where useful information lives.

For each of your top five values:

What does this value mean TO ME?

What does living by it actually look like?

What behaviour would contradict it?

Don't use dictionary definitions.

Define it in terms of your life.

5. The Bullshit Audit

Time for the slightly uncomfortable bit.

Take each of your five values and score yourself:

0 = I basically ignore this through to

10 = my life genuinely reflects this

Then ask:

Where do my actions contradict what I say matters to me?

For example:

You say family matters, but you're never present.

You say health matters, but you haven't prioritised it for years.

You say freedom matters, but every decision is based on somebody else's approval.

You say honesty matters, but you're not being honest with yourself.

That's not an invitation to beat yourself up.

It's an invitation to stop bullshitting yourself.

If something genuinely matters, eventually your behaviour needs to reflect it.

6. When Values Collide

Here's something values exercises often conveniently forget:

Your values can conflict with each other.

You can value:

Security AND adventure.

Family AND independence.

Achievement AND balance.

Honesty AND kindness.

And sometimes you can't satisfy both perfectly.

Think about a decision you're struggling with.

Which values are competing?

What does Value A want?

What does Value B want?

Which one matters more in THIS situation?

There isn't always a magical decision where everybody wins and nobody feels uncomfortable.

Sometimes clarity is simply knowing why you're choosing one thing over another.

7. Whose Life Are You Living?

Now look beyond individual decisions.

Think about:

Your relationships

Your work

Your home

Your money

Your time

Your health

Your friendships

Your future plans

For each area ask:

Does the way I'm living this part of my life reflect what I say matters to me?

If yes — brilliant.

If not:

Why not?

Is something genuinely preventing you?

Are you compromising temporarily for a good reason?

Or have you simply been living according to somebody else's priorities?

And here's the bastard question:

If nothing changed for the next five years, would I be okay with that?

Pay attention to your answer.

8. Turn Values Into Behaviour

Knowing your values is lovely.

Doing fuck all with that information isn't particularly useful.

So take your top three.

For each one, complete:

VALUE: _____

This matters to me because:

I'm already living this value when I:

I'm NOT living this value when I:

One behaviour I need to stop:

One behaviour I need to start:

One decision I could make differently:

Now we've turned a nice word into something you can actually use.

9. Your Values Compass

Finally, write your three core values somewhere you'll remember them.

When you're stuck on a decision, ask:

Which option fits the person I actually want to be?

Not:

Which option keeps everybody happy?

Not:

Which option looks best from the outside?

Not even:

Which option is easiest?

Sometimes the right decision is the easy one.

Sometimes it's a complete pain in the arse.

Your values don't make decisions for you.

They give you something to measure those decisions against.

A Final FlamingoRise Note

Your values aren't supposed to make you look like a good person on paper.

They're supposed to help you build a life that actually feels like yours.

And if you've discovered a massive gap between what you say matters and how you're currently living?

Good.

That's not failure. That's information.

You can't change something you haven't noticed.

Now you've noticed.

So the question isn't:

"Am I perfectly aligned with my values?"

Nobody fucking is.

The question is:

What's one thing I can do differently now that I know what actually matters?

Start there.

Reflect. Clarify. Align.

Rise. Heal. Soar. 🦋
