

Flamingo Rise

REAL TOOLS. BRIGHTER TOMORROWS.

GRIEF
IS LOVE
WITH NOWHERE
TO GO.
YOU ARE STILL ALLOWED TO FEEL IT.

You Are Allowed to Grieve

WORKBOOK

A gentle but honest workbook to help you navigate loss, process
your emotions and find your way forward —
in your own time,
in your own way.

Feel
Process
Heal
Remember
Move Forward

YOUR FEELINGS MATTER

THERE IS NO RIGHT TIMELINE

GRIEF LOOKS DIFFERENT FOR EVERYONE

YOU ARE NOT ALONE

BECAUSE HEALING DOESN'T MEAN
FORGETTING — IT MEANS CARRYING LOVE IN A NEW WAY.

YOU ARE ALLOWED TO GRIEVE

A guided meditation for loss, change and all the things that don't come with a neat ending.

Before you start, get yourself somewhere you can be undisturbed for a few minutes. Sit, lie down, stare at the ceiling - whatever works. There is no correct meditation position and nobody is handing out points for looking peaceful.

If closing your eyes feels comfortable, close them. If it doesn't, don't. You can simply soften your gaze and stay exactly where you are.

Arriving

Take a slow breath in.

And let it out without trying to make it impressive.

Again. Breathe in at a pace that feels comfortable, then breathe out.

[Pause for a few breaths]

Notice the chair, bed or floor supporting you. Notice the room around you. You don't need to disappear from the world. You're just giving yourself a few minutes where nothing needs fixing.

You are allowed to grieve.

Not only when somebody dies.

You can grieve a relationship. A home. Your health. A version of yourself. A future you expected to have. A choice that was taken away. A childhood you should have had. Words that were never said. An ending that arrived too early - or one that took far too bloody long.

Loss does not have to fit somebody else's definition before it counts.

Whatever Is Here

Notice what shows up when you think about what you have lost.

Sadness, anger, relief, guilt, numbness, love, resentment, confusion - perhaps several of them at once.

You do not need to pick the most socially acceptable one.

Grief can be contradictory. You can miss somebody and still know they hurt you. You can be relieved something ended and still mourn it. You can be grateful for what remains and furious about what disappeared.

Two things can be true at the same time.

[Pause - 15 seconds]

If it feels comfortable, place a hand on your chest, your stomach, your leg - anywhere that gives you something physical to notice.

Feel the movement of your breathing.

Nothing mystical required. Just evidence that you are here, in this moment, while this feeling is here too.

No Deadline

You do not have to 'move on' on anybody else's timetable.

You also do not have to stay inside grief every minute to prove that the loss mattered.

Laughing does not betray what you lost. Having a good day does not mean you have forgotten. A bad day does not mean you have gone backwards.

There is no tidy five-stage conveyor belt that you have failed because Tuesday feels worse than Monday.

You are allowed to feel what you feel - without turning it into a test you have to pass.

The Things That Don't Tie Up Neatly

Some losses come with answers. Some come with apologies. Some come with a funeral, a final conversation or a clear ending.

And some don't.

Sometimes there is no explanation good enough. No final sentence that makes everything click into place. No bow to tie around the whole bloody thing.

You can still keep living without pretending the unfinished parts suddenly make sense.

[Pause - 10 seconds]

Make Room, Not a Home

For the next few moments, you do not need to push the grief away.

But you do not have to drown in it either.

Just make enough room for whatever is here.

If tears come, let them come. If they don't, that is not evidence that you cared less. If you feel nothing at all today, numbness is still something your mind may be doing with a lot to carry.

There is no performance required.

Your grief does not need to look beautiful to be real.

What Remains

Think, gently, about what remains with you.

Maybe it is love. Maybe it is a lesson. A memory. A scar. A ridiculous story that still makes you laugh. A boundary you learned far too late. A piece of yourself you are rebuilding.

You do not have to call the loss a gift.

You are simply allowed to decide what you carry forward from here.

[Pause - 15 seconds]

Coming Back

When you are ready, notice the room again.

Feel whatever is beneath you. Notice one sound. Notice the temperature of the air. Move your fingers or your toes if that feels comfortable.

Take one more easy breath in.

And let it out.

I am grieving. I am still here. Both are true.

You do not have to finish this meditation feeling better.

You do not have to have solved anything.

If all you did was stop pretending for a few minutes that something didn't hurt, that is enough for today.

Be gentle with yourself afterwards in whatever way is actually useful - a drink, some food, a shower, fresh air, a distraction, somebody safe to talk to, or simply getting on with the rest of your day.

There is no perfect way to carry grief. There is only finding a way that lets you keep carrying yourself too.

Rise. Heal. Soar.

A small note: This meditation is a reflective wellbeing resource, not a replacement for professional bereavement, mental-health or crisis support. If grief is making everyday life feel unmanageable, reaching out for appropriate support is a sensible next step.